Hiker injured in surprise encounter with moose

A hiker was injured during a surprise close encounter with a bull moose while hiking east of Ennis on Wednesday, Jan. 27.

Two men in their 70s were hiking on U.S. Forest Service Trail 6317, commonly called the Jack Creek Trail, about 10 miles east of Ennis. Two miles up the trail, the men encountered a bull moose standing about 10 yards off one side of the trail.

The moose charged at the hikers. One of the men stood behind a standing tree while the other took cover under a fallen tree. The moose continued its approach and kicked at the man under the fallen tree until the other hiker was successful in driving the moose away.

The man who was kicked while under the tree was treated at Madison Valley Medical Center for injuries that were not life threatening. The other man did not require medical treatment.

Moose can be defensive and dangerous in surprise close encounters with people. FWP staff have posted signs at the entrance to this trail advising recreationists of the encounter. No further management action is planned at this time.

Moose can be found throughout most of Montana. Keep these precautions in mind to avoid negative encounters with moose:

- Be aware of your surroundings and be especially careful around creeks and in areas with dense brush.
- Travel in groups whenever possible and make casual noise to alert animals to your presence.
- If you encounter a moose, give it lots of space and don't approach it. Keep dogs under control at all times.
- If a moose charges or chases you, take cover behind something solid, such as a tree.

New Easement Clears Way for Public Access to Wyoming Mountains

Hunters, anglers and others will soon have access to more than 32,900 acres of previously difficult to reach public land in the Sublette Mountain Range of western Wyoming. Working in partnership with the Wyoming Game and Fish Department (WGFD) and others, the Rocky Mountain Elk Foundation assisted with the purchase of an important access agreement.

"Creating and improving public access is key to who we are as an organization and our mission," said Kyle Weaver, RMEF president and CEO. "There is currently limited access to the west side of the Sublette Range. This action will change that."

The agreement, targeted to take effect in the summer of 2021, will create a permanent public roadway and a parking area linked to the Groo Canyon trail from Highway 30 north of Cokeville near the Wyoming-Idaho border. Once finalized, the new entry point will allow access across private ranchland to lands overseen by the Bureau of Land Management known as the Raymond Mountain Wilderness Study Area and additional state and federal lands beyond that.

Historically, elk management has been particularly difficult in the Sublette Range because of limited public access. The new agreement will allow improved hunter access and opportunity, thus allowing WGFD to better attain population management objectives for elk, deer, moose, mountain lions and black bears.

In addition to WGFD, other project and funding partners include the Bass Pro Shops and Cabela's Outdoor Fund, onX and RMEF's Torstenson Family Endowment.

What they say about the Raymond Mountain project:

"As the Wyoming Game and Fish Department evaluates and pursues access projects, we look for opportunities that will have a substantial positive impact for our constituents and we feel the Raymond Mountain Public Access Area will provide that," said Sean Bibbey, WGFD lands branch chief. "The department looks forward to developing this area for use by the public in the coming

ELK SKELETON

By "Swede" Troedsson

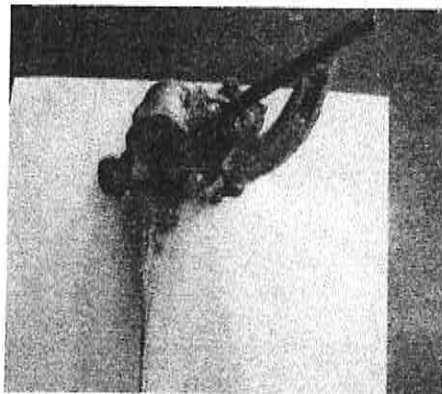

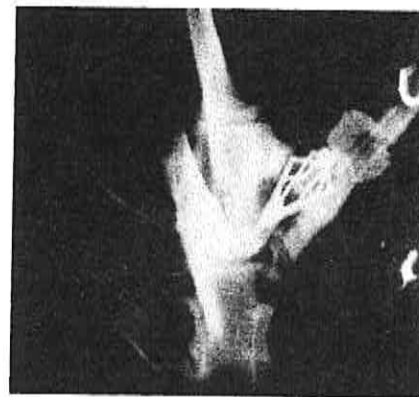

In June, 1996, Warden Mike Mehn and I were canoeing on Hidden Lake, located on the north side of the Centennial Valley in SW Montana. We were there to check on fishermen.

We stopped on the east shore to pick up trash left by campers. Next to the abandoned camp was the skeleton of a large bull elk. The elk appeared to have died the previous winter. The antlers and elk ivory teeth were missing. Imbedded in the vertebra was an arrow head. The shaft was broken off.

The angle of the arrow suggests an uphill shot entered under the rib and lodged in the spine. We speculate that the wounded elk was shot on the bench above the lake, and made its way down to the lake to be near water, where it died.

Later a Dillon large animal veterinarian informed me that she estimated that the calcium callous (growth around the arrow head) took 6-8 weeks to form.

A photo of the spine, along with an x-ray of the imbedded arrow head, are displayed below.

year and we want to thank RMEF and the other partners on this project for their hard work and support to make this opportunity happen."

"This collaborative public access project in the Sublette Range is a true win-win for conservation and all who love the outdoors," said Bob Ziehmer, Bass Pro Shops and Cabela's senior director of conservation. "When completed, the new entry point will be a game-changer in improving recreational opportunities and wildlife management in the region. We thank our generous customers for rounding up to the Bass Pro Shops and Cabela's Outdoor Fund, providing funding for this key project."

"We applaud the Wyoming Game and Fish Department for working to secure improved access to public lands," said Lisa Nichols, onX access advocacy manager. "We also want to recognize the ranching family who prioritized the recreation potential on land that is dear to their heart. Increasing hunting and public access opportunities for everyone is core to onX's mission, and we're honored to be part of projects like these."
