Youth injured by otter while floating Big Hole River

A 12-year-old boy from Butte was injured by an otter while floating on the Big Hole River west of Divide on Friday.

Two boys were floating on inner tubes about a half mile upstream from the Powerhouse Fishing Access Site when they observed several otters downstream. They tried to keep their distance from the otters, but one of the otters approached and attacked one of the boys. Two adults who were camping nearby helped drive the otters away and bring the boys to safety.

Fortunately, the boy was able to receive prompt treatment for injuries that were not life threatening. The other boy was not injured.

Montana Fish, Wildlife & Parks staff have signed several fishing access sites in the area advising recreationists of the incident. No further management action is planned at this time.

While attacks from otters are rare, otters can be protective of their young. They give birth to their young in April and can later be seen with their young in the water during the summer. They may also be protective of food resources, especially when those resources are scarce. Otters are members of the weasel family.

FWP advises recreationists to give all wildlife plenty of space. In drought conditions, low water levels can bring recreationists closer to water-dwelling wildlife. Keeping your distance can help avoid dangerous encounters, reduce stress for wildlife and promote healthy animal behavior.

Learning How to Drive

Bryce Angell

Sixty years ago, I learned to drive my father's truck.
And no one got ran over. Have to say was more than luck.
I drove the truck down through the field. Seemed summer's hottest days. And soon found out you never pop the clutch when hauling hay.
At fourteen years I passed the test. Now legal behind the wheel.
We'd speed down highway 20 listening to the tires squeal.
We drove our cars and worn-out trucks, too fast those teenage years.
We liked to hear the deafening roar when shifting through the gears.
I guess as time would have it, we outgrew the crazy stage.
Our driving turned responsible. They say it comes with age.
But those younger years of driving truck while hauling loads of hay, taught me to keep my eyes peeled for cars heading in my way.
Beware of my surroundings, more than me out on the road.
And always keep and eye out for the driver who's stoned cold.
Well, now that I'm retired and have a bit of common sense.
I'd have to say I've slowed down and my driving's in defense.
The other day while driving on the road of, "Risk your life."
A motorcycle loaded with the driver and his wife,
Attempted to fly by us 'cuz our lane was driving slow.
We were stuck behind a motorhome and driving with the flow.
A semi-truck was baring down about to smash the bike.
I slammed the brake. The biker's wave sure wasn't lady like.
I hope one day she'll realize they almost caused their death.
They barely missed the trucker. Prob'ly even smelled his breath.
But one thing was for certain when I slammed down on the brake.
My inner trained reflexes did not kick in by mistake.

DO YOU LOVE OR DREAD FAMILY PORTRAITS?

Tyrades! by Danny Tyree

My family took the easy way out – again.

We had our annual chance at a professional portrait and decided to let (insist) son Gideon pose solo for the umpteenth time.

Oh, we've had three-person portraits before and every once in a great while, I get an updated "mug shot" for this column (amazing how editors can crop out the spear and the wooly mammoth!), but this year we wound up pinning all our hopes on Gideon once more.

My wife and I always pledge to do better next time, but we have an unfortunate Ko(dak)-dependency thing going on.

Let's face it: curing the common cold is only slightly more difficult than getting three or more people all available, all photogenic, all well-dressed, all tanned and rested, all cooperative at the same time.

There's a reason "Synchronized Looking Halfway Decent" can't field enough contestants to be an official Olympic event.

Aristotle claimed nature abhors a vacuum. Well, it's not exactly fond of letting people create a treasured memory, either.

Mention an appointment for a sitting and Murphy's Law goes into overdrive, producing a spontaneous eruption of mandatory overtime, hot flashes, nasal torrents, migraines, bloating, ineffective toothpicks, zits, nervous tics, suicidal ice cream cones, tattletale whining, strands of hair seemingly controlled by an Indian snake charmer, blinking eyes that are evidently trying to send a coded message revealing the plans for D-Day, grandparents whispering "DO YOU THINK WE'RE SUPPOSED TO TIP THIS FOREIGN-LOOKING PHOTOGRAPHER?," etcetera.

Mankind is fortunate to have individuals who can counteract all this and produce stunning heirlooms. As someone should have said, "When God got bored with making order out of chaos, he turned the job over to professional photographers."

Granted, the Almighty is a mite peeved with those photographers who use His Son's name in vain the first time they meet appearance-challenged Little Johnny. ("Marlboro doesn't have enough filters to make THIS kid look good! Maybe if I tie a porkchop around his neck, the shutter will open.")

Even worse than the ordeal of getting a group picture made is the stressful experience of deciding whether to purchase prints a la carte or spring for the full package.

It's heartrending to think about glossy photos of your loved ones being nonchalantly shredded. And I've heard the studios are upping the ante. ("No hard feelings. For each sheet you reject, we will also uproot one rain forest tree and tell an Afghan orphan his pet lamb is being moved to a farm upstate…")

I realize that the charmed people whose life is One Big Christmas Letter ("While in Tahiti to get our colonoscopies – photos included – and decide whether to give Suzy that island or Harvard University as a wedding gift…") will look down upon me for settling for shortcuts. They'll doubtless pontificate something such as "Well, if it really meant anything to him, he would make time to get a good portrait."

Honestly, I do regret that photos of me, my brother and our parents all together are rare or nonexistent; but I won't apologize for being realistic about family portraits going forward.

I wouldn't sleep any better thinking that someday my great-great grandchildren will fight over a framed image of ancestors struggling to look comfortable for two seconds.

"Hmph. You can have this one, sis. But dibs on the picture of the wooly mammoth!"
