The Outhouse Climb

Bryce Angell

Our final stop came into view. We'd traveled bend to bend.

I wondered if the forest road would ever have an end.

We'd planned this trip for weeks to Yellow Jacket Ranger Station.

The cabin was a welcome sight, way back in God's creation.

I couldn't help but notice the old outhouse up the hill.

And shouldn't privies always be a pleasant walk downhill?

The Northern late fall wind blew through the cabin's cedar door.

I stuffed a blanket in the cracks from ceiling to the floor.

The cabin was an icebox. It was dark at half past six.

The woodstove begged for fire. I chopped a birch log into sticks.

So I struck a match and lit the kindling, closed the door down tight.

The old wood stove would prove its worth giving heat throughout the night.

My mind turned to the outhouse, uphill fifty yards or so.

I had taken care of business so I didn't have to go.

For dinner we ate chicken stew, left from the night before.

I ate like no tomorrow, didn't know what lay in store.

Outside the night was closing in. I heard a coyote yip.

I wondered, "Does he feel the cold? The fall air bites a bit."

My sleeping bag lay by the stove. I soaked in all the heat.

And sleep was just a blink away, a long day now complete.

But then, I'd say around midnight or somewhere there about, my stomach set to growling, 'cuz the stew was needing out.

I hoped this might be just a dream. How could it be for real?

But my stomach soon convinced me from the cramps that I could feel.

I grabbed my boots and flashlight, stepped out in the cold night air.

I must have been a awful sight, just boots and underwear.

The run uphill with cheeks pressed tight met early morning sleet.

But nothing could deter me from the outhouse one-hole seat.

A builder stamped his name inside the rickety old privy.

Why did he build it up so high? I'd like to stamp him silly.

I dashed back to the cabin through the sleet and pouring rain.

Then stoked the fire and downed an Alka Seltzer for the pain.

Good old Mother Nature wasn't kind to me that night.

And with every uphill trek I cursed the builder's name outright.

State of Montana responds in TikTok lawsuit

The State of Montana, through its Attorney General Austin Knudsen, called on a federal judge today to keep Montana's law banning TikTok in the state in effect while the case proceeds in federal court, citing well-documented concerns over the app's massive data-harvesting practices and access to that data granted to Chinese Communist Party (CCP) officials.

The Montana legislature passed and Governor Greg Gianforte signed Senate Bill 419 (SB 419), which requires TikTok to stop operating in the state and prohibits mobile application stores from making TikTok available for download starting on January 1, 2024. Shortly after the Governor signed SB 419 into law, the company and a group of users funded by TikTok filed lawsuits against the State and requested a preliminary injunction. The reply filed today in the U.S. District Court for the District of Montana refutes and calls out the hypocrisy in the company's legal arguments for the injunction.

The State of Montana has the power to regulate products or practices that in its judgment impose unjustifiable consumer harms.

Also noted in the brief is that 45 other states are actively investigating TikTok's safety and data-harvesting features.

Bulldog Volleyball Dominates in Season Opener

The Bulldog Women's Volleyball team got off to a hot start to begin the 2023 campaign with a sweep (25-11, 25-12, 25-15) over Walla Walla University (Wash.).

How It Happened

Kaylee Fritz had a hot hand in set one, serving the Bulldogs to an 8-0 lead over the Wolves. Though allowing the Wolves to sneak a few points, a kill from Jordan Olson provided another boost to put the Bulldogs up 11-3. Peyton Vogl followed up with a pair of aces and a big block in the front row from Danyel Martin and KayLee Kopp gave the Bulldogs a 14-3 lead. UMW continued to roll on to a 25-11 victory in set one.

Though trading points early on in set two, the Bulldogs continued to follow the same pattern from set one. Freshman Sophie Worden recorded her first two aces as a Bulldog, while on her way to four aces on the night. The Bulldogs continued to hit a team average of .462 across the set, winning set two 25-12.

Jazi Smith rattled off back-to-back kills to start the third frame to put the Bulldogs out in front early. Despite the early boost from Smith, the Bulldogs trailed 8-9 to the Wolves. Smith and Martin combined for two kills and an assisted block to steal back the lead and put UMW back on top at 11-9. The Bulldogs went on to outscore the Wolves 14-6 down the stretch to finish the final set.
