Montana Western Fine Arts Gallery Presents the Works of Kim Giannone

The University of Montana Western is honored to present The Works of Kim Giannone, an exhibit celebrating the life and work of the late artist and student. This exhibit features work by Giannone from several different series, including "Sweat and Sagebrush," "The Early Years," journals, and other draft prints. The exhibition will open on Thursday, April 16, and will feature an opening reception from 5:00–7:00 p.m. in the Fine Arts Gallery located in Main Hall.

Kimberly Giannone, born in Philadelphia on December 23, 1979, whose life was cut short by advanced ovarian cancer, passed away on December 11, 2025. Kim was a resident of Polaris, MT, a student at the University of Montana Western majoring in Environmental Sustainability, and an incredibly talented photographer and artist. Her work documented the full visual and emotional spectrum of her life in an authentic and raw way that is rare to encounter. Kim was a force to be reckoned with and was a well-loved friend, partner, family member, student, and member of the Dillon, Grasshopper, and Big Hole communities. She worked at several local ranches and businesses and was a local powder hound at Maverick Mountain.

Kim grew up in inner-city Philadelphia, in a loud, colorful world full of hustle and bustle, finding beauty and solace in singular moments of time. Photography became her main tool to explore, learn, and document. After studying photography in Boston in her early twenties, she traversed the country, working seasonal jobs and living on the road. As she grew older, a strong instinct to spend more time in sparse and natural places began to germinate. The endless countryside and the lives that dotted the vast landscape became her main interest.

Her work is an inquiry into the relationship between human beings and the natural world we inhabit and continue to modify. Kim used photography, writing, audio recording, and mixed media journaling to process observations and interactions with communities within developed metropolises, the rural countryside, and the remote wilderness.

In "The Early Years" series, Kim captures growing up in Philadelphia, reveling in the chaos of life in the city streets. She was given a camera in her late teens and found she could use this tool to freeze time—keeping moments and memories in her own small museum. She fell in love with the faces of strangers and the buildings and man-made objects that seemed to overtake anything remotely natural. Constantly observing her environment, she sought to capture and hold onto each moment, becoming focused on finding stillness within motion. She appreciated the juxtaposition of man-made creations with the natural world and found joy in how people could appear out of place in nature. She aimed to capture the changing color and light from the beginning to the end of each day.

“Sweat and Sagebrush” portrays Beaverhead County, Montana—a vast, sparsely populated landscape of snow-capped mountains, sagebrush valleys, and dirt roads—where ranching has been the economic and cultural backbone since the 1800s. It celebrates multigenerational ranching families with deep knowledge of land and animals, self-reliance, craftsmanship, and hard work, while also revealing the often-overlooked labor behind the romanticized American West.

Despite enduring traditions and passion, ranching feels increasingly threatened and may become more rare over time. Kim believed ranchers are among the most multifaceted and resourceful people, with extensive knowledge of land and animals. Living remotely requires a wide range of skills. They maintain their own equipment, buildings, and livelihoods. The fabric of their lives is deeply interwoven with time, tradition, pride, craftsmanship, and hard work.

In addition to these two series, several draft photographs from other series will be on display, along with her journals, which are filled with drawings, collages, and writings reflecting her daily experiences.

Kim will be profoundly missed in this community, at the University of Montana Western, and by her family and friends. She will be awarded a B.A. in Environmental Sustainability from Western this spring, and her sister will receive it in

Casting call for background extras on "The Last Big Sky"

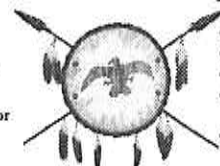

The Last Big Sky is a powerful psychological drama that follows a mother whose deep assimilated Nigerian faith is tested when she travels to a familiar, yet unfamiliar Montana hospital to confront the impossible task of taking her star-athlete son, Jason, off life support after a tragic injury on the football field. It follows her final act of maternal love and the quiet devotion required to survive the unimaginable.

The film will be shot on location throughout Dillon April 23, 24, 25 and 26 and the production will need background extras. Local film maker, Stan Smith and Nnamdi Kanaga, a Nigerian writer, director, now living in Montana, are working to bring this emotional story to the screen.

Stan is casting background extras to appear in a football game, hospital and cafe scenes. If you have a free day or an afternoon and would enjoy seeing how a film production comes together contact Stan on facebook messenger with questions and interest. No acting or film experience needed. Join us in telling this story based on true events to the screen.

Food is Medicine: Potatoes

Potatoes hold a powerful place in nutrition history. Early explorers and populations relied on spuds as a life-saving food because their naturally high vitamin C content helped prevent scurvy when fresh fruits weren't available. Beyond that, they're an excellent source of potassium—providing levels that can rival (or even exceed) a banana, along with fiber (especially in the skin), vitamin B6, and even a small amount of protein, making them a great ally for supporting healthy blood pressure, heart function, and proper nerve signaling—all while being naturally fat-free. In fact, people could sustain themselves for long periods on a simple diet of potatoes and whole milk thanks to their complementary nutrient profiles (not that I'm advocating that—but good to know in a pinch!). Interestingly, when cooked and cooled, potatoes develop resistant starch, a type of prebiotic (non-digestible) fiber that feeds beneficial gut bacteria and supports gut health and more balanced blood sugar. Where things tend to go sideways is in the preparation: when potatoes are deep-fried in low-quality, highly processed oils, they can form inflammatory compounds—so it's less about the potato itself and more about what we do to it that matters. Potatoes are an incredibly nutritious and versatile staple that can be enjoyed baked, boiled, steamed, or mashed, and for the most nutritional value, keep the skins on—that's where much of the fiber and minerals live.

*When it comes to sourcing, the Environmental Working Group often includes potatoes on its "Dirty Dozen" list, meaning they may carry higher pesticide residues, so opting for organic when possible—or better yet, growing your own—can be a helpful choice.

Good health is built day by day, starting with real food.

Blue pinwheels at Dillon Public Library

Dillon Public Library is one of the many groups in Montana that will be "planting" blue pinwheels in April, which is "Strengthening Families Month".

The Montana Children's Trust Fund (MCTF) uses blue pinwheels as the national symbol for child abuse prevention, planting thousands across the state each April to represent hope, health, and safety. This initiative promotes safe, nurturing environments and highlights resources available to support families, partnering with organizations to raise awareness for child abuse prevention month. #GoBlue #StrongFamilies #SafeKids #GrowingBetterTogether #CAPM @mtchildrenstrust
